"Geoleadership: Leading diverse groups, intercultural communication and leadership development"

Abstract: Global business has grown beyond economic exchanges between nations to include cultural engagements, thus weaving a complex social component into global practices. The challenge is how to manage our multiple, simultaneous cultural identities. A leader who can accommodate and master these challenges practices what we refer to as geoleadership. Interpersonal communication and interaction pose several leadership challenges for intercultural leaders and managers. Differences in language, in cultural preferences for space, social penetration, intonation, spatial distance, implicit versus explicit styles and more, play a role in the success or failure of any intercultural communication. There must be an integration of both multicultural and performance dimensions in constructing global leadership competency models. So as to remain competitive, global business leaders need to adapt to diverse national organisational and professional cultures. Leaders must also be aware of the pitfalls of working in global contexts and the potential risk of lost opportunities. We will look at the Geoleadership Model and see how it can be leveraged across physical and virtual borders (http://geoleadership.com/model.asp).
