A gendered comparison of extended working life policies across seven countries by Áine Ní Léime, Chairperson of COST Action

This presentation draws on findings from a recent book published by researchers in COST Action IS1409, Gender and Health Implications of Extended Working Life in Western Countries, a network of researchers from 34 countries focusing on the issue of extended working life (Ní Léime et al, 2017). The Extended Working Life (EWL) policy agenda has been strongly promoted by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) and the European Union (EU) in response to population ageing and anticipated increased pension costs (OECD, 2006, 2013). The EWL policies that have been introduced have been critiqued on the basis that most are simplistic one-size-fits-all measures that do not take into account the typically differentiated work-life trajectories of men and women, of those in precarious and secure jobs and of those in physically-demanding and sedentary employment.

The presentation adopts a gendered political economy of ageing approach to policy analysis. It contextualises and compares EWL policies in Australia, Germany, Ireland, Portugal, Sweden, the UK and the US, from a gender perspective. These policies include increasing state pension age, requiring increased contributions to qualify for contributory state pensions, introducing tax incentives for private pensions, and workplace measures encouraging flexible working for older workers. They typically also include removing incentives to early retirement and introducing barriers to exits from employment for health reasons. Findings from a recent study of EWL in Ireland and the US will also be drawn upon to discuss the attitudes of workers in various occupations to EWL policy. Commonalities and differences across the countries will be teased out and the implications for future policy with a focus on gender, health and precarity will be discussed. Some examples of promising practice in terms of policies for older workers will be presented.
